A military program will help protect 3.5M acres of southern Indiana and aid landowners

f

Carol Kugler, The Herald-Times

February 18, 2022 · 4 min read

Wapehani Mountain Bike Park on the edge of Bloomington is one of the natural areas within the newly formed Southern Indiana Sentinel Landscape.

More than 3.5 million acres of southern Indiana — from just south of Indianapolis to near Jasper and from the Illinois border to near Madison — is now designated as the Southern Indiana Sentinel Landscape.

The area is larger than all of Yellowstone National Park and about the same size as the state of Connecticut. Within the boundaries, private landowners, farmers, as well as land assistance and funding for conservation easements.

Up until now Indiana groups, including land trusts, have been working with the U.S. Forest Service and state Department of Natural Resources to protect and conserve small tracts of land, slowly adding the acres into larger segments.

Now the Southern Indiana Sentinel Landscape will combine efforts of federal agencies, regional organizations, state officials and communities to educate farmers on soil conservation, aid landowners in repairing eroding banks along streams and help Indiana add land in public parks and forests.

Christian Freitag, executive director of the Conservation Law Center and associate clinical professor of law at IU Maurer School of Law, explained that across Indiana and many other states, conservation historically has been done piecemeal. The Southern Indiana Sentinel Landscape is one of the state's largest conservation projects and allows government agencies, regional groups and private landowners to work together in a way that views the resources through a broader lens.

"The evolution of conservation thinking is what we call landscape scale conservation," he told The Herald-Times. "Rather than just saving this spot and that spot, you try to connect the dots. In southern Indiana, we can do that through water corridors, intact forest blocks, and working
